An allowance can give children opportunities to learn about the value of money first-hand. They can make a financial decision, and if it turns out to be a mistake, it won't be too costly.

What the child is expected to pay for should be explained clearly to the child. When children are first given an allowance, they often go and spend all of it at once. The parents are advised not to give their children any more money until the next allowance is due. In this way, children can learn the main goal, which is that budgeting means making decisions. They have to choose how much to spend, and how much to save.

When it comes to paying children for doing household chores, some say it is not good to pay children for doing these as they are a part of normal daily life. However, paying children for any extra work they do around the house can benefit them as it will teach them the basics of business.

Ultimately, there are three things children can do with their allowance: save, spend, or donate. Saving lets children experience the sacrifice in the now for the future plan. Secondly, children may like to spend their money on things they want. Also, they can donate to good causes or buy gifts, and thus experience sharing their income.
